Now there is, it would appear, a new danger threatening in the north in the shape of a plague of locusts. The Nanking correspondent of the Shanghai Courier states that for miles around the country beyond Tan-yang seemed to be a living mass of these insects. It appears likely that both Kiangsu and Anhwei will suffer severely from the scourge, and the greatest anxiety prevails among the natives in danger, there has been no rain worth mention up north for many weeks, and the prospect is accordingly anything but cheerful. The Viceroy has, it is stated, despatched the soldiers to fight the locusts, a very sensible way of turning these useless "braves" to account. They are seldom, it is to be feared, so usefully employed. He has prescribed five catties of locusts as the

THE CURED ACQUAINTANCE

A cortain acquaintance incessantly came. And worrled the painter De Brown; Holl Tower his pictures with praises or blame, With such a self-satisfied frown; "There's semething that's wrong," he would always

But he never said how and he never said where.

He'd bring in a pot of the loveliest paint, And brushes as big as your head, And, spite of the artist's impassioned complaint Ignoring the tears that be shed, He'd touch up the works in his own little style, Whonever the painter went out for awhile.

The heart of the painter grew heavy, like lead, Quito tiring to lift, as it were; He shaved all the heir from the crown of his head In token of bitter despair----Then, somehow, he suddenly hanished his pain And put on the hair ho'discarded again.

"I wish you would give me a sitting," he said, To him who'd occasioned his wees: "I'm struck with the classical chape of your head, And you have such a beautiful nose! "This chance," thought the critic, "twere foolish to My vanity often has panted for this!

" All right." said the painter, " we'd better begin, And twisted him up in a way No fullible mortal could twist himself in If he tried for a year and a day ? It would have been utterly hopelons to seek. To get him untwisted in less than a week.

The model was posed in the greatest delight, With a patisfied vanity grin; But to give you a notion, though feeble and slight, Of the difficult pose he was in) His shadow was puzzled what pattern to trace, And wandered insanely all over the place.

A perfect resthetical feast: There's the loveliest fold that I over beheld: It will take me a year, at the least, Don't move till I've finished, or all is in vain; I'm cortain we couldn't arrange it again."

The model was good, I must certainly say; No thing to go eniggering at,... To keep yourself still for a year and a day -In such a position as that i. The teeth of the model were rigidly set-The painter was barely beginning as yet!

The model grew orcopy with stiffnes and pain From the top of his head to his toes; And once he was plainly observed to complain, "It is rather a difficult pose"." The painter, all smiling, and bland and benign, Now paused in his work for a season, to dine. "How I wish you could share this refreshment with

Said the painter. "You needn't be told-But you mustn't be moved in the slightest degree For fear of disturbing the fold." The model emitted a groan; it was plain That his love for the fold was beginning to wane.

Though summer and winter and stiffness and cold, In thirstiness, hunger, and tears, The model abstained from disturbing the fold: For seven interminate years, "You might," said the painter, "be glad of a stretch,

For I think I may say I've completed the sketch.".

The model commenced an attempt to untwist, But, oh, from his head to his toos, He was perfectly stiff and he had to desist For he couldn't come out of the pose-So dreadfully stiff was this victim of art.

That you might have supposed be was quet for the part The painter, assisted by one of his friends, Arranged him atop of a chair, Then each of them sat upon one of his ends, Maintaining the balance with care; But just as their efforts were getting him straight, He broke in the middle, I'm sorry to state.

They put him together with proper cement, And he couldn't do less than adhere; But, spite of the time and the money they spent He always was shaky and queer-A little unsettled, purhaps, at the worst, But still he was never as good as at first.

He said there were pains in the centre of him (In the waist they had had to repair); And, no matter how lightly the matter you skim. You will fully believe that there were. But still his experience wasn't in vain. For he never went bothering painters again.
